for failure of silent aspiration in patients with a laryngeal mask. This prospective study was conducted to determine the predictive factors for failure of silent aspiration of a laryngeal mask airway (LMA) in general anesthesia. Seventy patients were anesthetized by target-controlled infusion of propofol using a Marsh pump (LP 907 Anesthesia System, Instrumentarium, Cambridge, UK) and then randomly assigned to receive either a LMA or tracheal intubation. Tracheal intubation was performed using a standard rapid sequence induction with a mean target concentration of 6.0 microg x ml(-1) propofol. In LMA group, the LMA was inserted using standard technique. Arterial blood gases were obtained before induction of anesthesia, at awakening after LMA insertion and after tracheal intubation. The percentage of patients who failed to achieve no aspiration was significantly higher in the LMA
